> Finance Minister Bezalel Smotrich describes Israeli government settlement expansion in the West Bank, including 103 new settlements and 160 villages, alongside infrastructure investment. He states the policy aims to bring one million settlers to the region and explicitly frames this expansion as incompatible with Palestinian statehood.

SAŽETAK

Finance Minister Bezalel Smotrich outlines the scope and intent of Israeli settlement activity in the West Bank. He details the establishment of 103 new settlements and 160 Israeli villages, accompanied by road construction, planning, and administrative development. Smotrich characterizes the government's investment of billions of shekels in this expansion as part of a broader strategy to bring one million settlers to what he terms Judea and Samaria. He explicitly frames this settlement expansion and infrastructure investment as fundamentally incompatible with the establishment of a Palestinian state, questioning the logical consistency of such expenditure if Palestinian statehood were an actual policy objective. The statement reflects the government's positioning on territorial presence and Palestinian political sovereignty in the West Bank.
